1. RESEARCH PROFILE

Carolina Pacchi holds a PhD in Urban and Environmental Planning. She is Assistant Professor (Ricercatore) at Politecnico di Milano, where she teaches Planning Theory and Practice and Local Conflict Resolution in the Master in Urban Planning and Policy Design.

She is involved in research activities that move from a combination of a planning and a policy analysis background and look primarily to planning strategies based on stakeholder involvement and innovative policies for urban and environmental planning.

Her main research interests include:

- urban conflict and contentious processes, in their relationship with grassroots initiatives, active citizenship, urban movements, in a planning perspective;
- the development and the peculiarities of the European City, in the relationship between historical development of the urban armature and structure, political role and profile, morphological transformations
- local development policies, both in the framework of EU funded policies (Cohesion Policy, Interreg, ..) and within national programmes, with a particular attention towards the dimensions of social capital, institutional capacity and strategies to tackle capacity gaps
- the evolution of the peculiar relationship between urban spaces and places of production, looking in particular to the innovative workplaces connected with the emergence of the knowledge economy
- environmental policies, in the framework of the possibilities for effective policy integration, paying specific attention to the role of knowledge and evaluation strategies

She has done extensive research on partnership building and social capital in local development policies within EU funded programmes. She has worked in EU funded research projects about policies for sustainability at the local and national level. She has done research on the transformations of the European city, about which she published a book in 2011. She is currently involved in research on the role of active citizenship in contributing to urban innovation and on the relationship between grassroots initiatives and planning frameworks, policies and tools. She will spend a research period at TU Berlin in the Summer semester 2016 working on such topics.

She has published books, contributions to books and papers on Italian and international journals on these research topics, and she regularly takes part to national and international conferences.
